Since the dawn of civilization, man - homo constructor - has intuitively sought to transform his surroundings and order them according to a sense known to himself, in a more or less permanent way. In this activity, not only great buildings, but even the least permanent human works, become, in a certain space of time, a trace - a signature of creative actions. The article contains a historical outline of the Romanesque rotunda - a special element in the space of the cultural landscape of the Tumskie Hill in Plock, which remains not only as a trace in the programmatic plane of the place, but today is a real trace - a symbolically marked place of its existence.
